The Elk Ridge Assembly Rooms building stands on the north side of Lawyer's Hill Road just west of the intersection of Old Lawyer's Hill Road. It is composed of two sections built into a slope of land falling northward so that its five bay wide, two bay deep tent roofed shingled north wing is two stories high while its three bay wide, four bay deep intersecting gable roof (running north south) south wing is only one story high.

A gabled roof, shingled, one story high portico supported by shingled columns covers the central double paneled entrance door which is flanked by 16-16 light jib windows whose bottom wooden panels can be opened to form french doors. Four similar windows are located on its east and west walls.

Built on land donated by Judge George Washington Dobbin whose proposal to create a "neighborhood parlor" led to the construction of these Assembly Rooms, it was meant to serve specifically as a vehicle for healing any separations within the neighborhood which had been incurred by the Civil War.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Elk Ridge Assembly Rooms' building is a three bay wide, four bay deep, gabled roof, shingled frame, one story high structure whose gabled roof (running north-south) springs outward on either side to create a chinese roof effect and intersects with a five bay wide, two bay deep, tent roofed (running east-west) two story high, stage wing which holds a rectangular stage door approached by five open wooden stairs on the east side of its south wall and a similar door on the west side.

The central, rectangular double entrance door with proportionally scaled panels is covered by a one story high, gabled roof portico supported by square shingled columns on cement bases.

The entrance is flanked by 16-16 light jib windows, whose bottom panels can be opened to create french doors, and is surmounted by an oval paned window with key stone.

The three bay wide, four bay deep auditorium has a central and side aisles and hold four east and west windows similar to those on the front facade. In the summer it is particularly pleasing, opening up the windows on each side to the pleasant evenings.

The original building was designed by Robert Stead, a Washington architect and summer resident of the hill. It burned and was replaced.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Assembly Room is significant historically and architecturally.

Historically it was built to provide the Lawyer's Hill area with a room for dances, , plays, tableaux, readings, etcetera. Formerly, all the neighbors had gathered in the home of Judge Dobbin, "The Lawn" and at Rockburn. Plays and musicals were held at these private homes followed by refreshments and/or dinner.

"The early days of the sixties were shadowed by the war", wrote Rebecca Pue Penniman, daughter of Judge Dobbin. She recalled the day when the family sat on the porch of the Lawn listening to the guns of the first battle of Manasses. She relates that Lawyer's Hill was almost equally divided in sentiment, and feeling ran very high. It was thus determined by all never to let the question of the North and South be discussed which left the residents at the end of the war as good friends as ever.

In 1869 the construction of The Assembly Room was proposed by Judge Dobbin as a kind of neighborhood parlor and the land given by him in the summer of 1870. The Assembly Room was opened with the production of "The Rivals" by the residents. Later its productions became so popular that tickets were sold in Baltimore on which the train schedule from Baltimore to Elkridge were printed.

Architecturally it is representative of the shingle style in architecture. Simple in design to serve the purpose of neighborhood gatherings and theatricals, its intersecting roof lines add interest as well as its jib windows and gabled roof entrance portico.

Built for a unique purpose, that of assembling a divided neighborhood after a terrible war and uniting them through their artistic endeavors with the theatre and the arts, The Assembly Room is of national significance. Serving a humanitarian purpose, it resulted in not only healing the wounds of its participants but furnishing fine entertainment for its visitors.

The Assembly Room is one of Howard County's finest landmarks and should be included along with the entire Lawyer's Hill area in an Historic District for both the National Register and for Howard County, should its residents so desire.
